If you have ever been to a forest and tried to take photos, you probably know that it is not that easy to take a picture that does it justice. Forests are dark and have high contrasts of very deep shadows and bright highlights. The leaves scatter the light, and as a forest is usually not neat and tidy it can be hard to find a composition that works.

photography, and within nature photography, trees are one of the most common subjects. Trees are widespread, tremendously diverse, and can make both beautiful and majestic subjects. Photo by peaceful-jp-scenery (busy); ISO 200, f/13.0, 1/50-second exposure. In some respects, trees are also easy to photograph: they are widely visible and, unlike animals, they sit still, allowing you to carefully compose exactly the photo you wish to capture.
